

About the UCSF-JHU Opioid Industry Document Archive

The UCSF-JHU Opioid Industry Document Archive serves as a groundbreaking digital archive of documents from the opioid industry that advances understanding of the root causes of the opioid epidemic and helps address corporate behavior that is harmful to the public.

The University of California, San Francisco (UCSF), and Johns Hopkins University launched the archive in March 2021.

Documents in the archive serve to advance understanding of the root causes of the opioid epidemic by:

- Increasing transparency regarding the development, manufacturing, marketing, promotion, and sales of prescription opioids
- Providing policymakers with insights about how the harms that have occurred from opioids can be prevented in the future through legal and regulatory reform
- Helping health systems, clinicians, patients, and caregivers make more informed decisions about the appropriate role of opioids in clinical care
- Providing evidence to support changes in policy and practice

The Opioid Industry Documents Archive team can guide you through searching, retrieving, and analyzing documents, including:

- Court and litigation documents (expert depositions, complaints, amendments, and internal company communications)
- Documents from federal, state, and local government agencies
- Testimony from advocacy organizations (accounts of people with lived experience, addiction, and impact of the epidemic)

“A top focus of our opioid litigation has always been about ensuring transparency and telling the story of the harm done to families across this country. Making this evidence available to the public will pave the way for important reforms that will save lives and let the families, survivors, and advocates who have been affected by the opioid epidemic see the truth.”

—Maura Healey, former Attorney General of Massachusetts (2021)
